Hydrologic balance is closely related to public health and safety especially in regard to potable water supplies, irrigation and stock feeding, and recreational facilities. This guideline provides guidance on how to restore the hydrologic balance through various reclamation activities. Beneficial impacts to public health and safety that will result by restoring hydrologic balances are numerous and may include enhancement of water quality and quantity, decreased erosion and downstream sedimentation, decrease in flood potentials, increased watershed storage capacity, and improvement in groundwater supply and quality. Indirect short-term adverse impacts which could result from reclamation activities are fugitive dust problems, water channelization and impoundment, and water quality degradations. (n) Public health and safety This guideline generally covers the spectrum of public health and safety problems caused by abandoned mine lands. Mitigation of public health and safety hazards is for the most part, an emergency and first priority project. Examples of public health and safety hazards are: (1) Disease caused by dumping wastes in mined areas, directing sewage into underground workings, or flies, rats, and other vectors frequenting the dump areas; (2) highwalls, some as high as 200 feet; (3) open shafts, voids, and subsidence; (4) mine drainage; (5) subsidences triggering landslides; (6) slides and slide-prone areas; and (7) burning surface and underground mines and refuse pile fires causing noxious gas release and surface flssuring. Mitigation of this wide spectrum of AML problems that affect public health and safety will result in long-term beneficial impacts. Adverse impacts on public health and safety resulting from...
