We want better education with not much more money, students who want to learn, teachers who want to teach, industry who can select from our students without going abroad for talent. Everybody says they want it, but what s the problem here? This book has the simplest of purposes, which is to return students to their natural human accord with learning as the basis of educational reform. It describes how students have been separated from their innate proclivity to learn; how we have allowed the pervasive rationalism of our culture to dominate our approach to learning and consequently, to our educational system, which is obviously ineffective. It illustrates how practical and sensible learning can return our students to the joy and excitement of learning. This work contends that when we strive to develop and activate an education process that reflects more direct connection to the process of natural learning, and test it in actual practice, we will find that the results will offer educational reform that provides effective learning opportunities to all. Commentary about Practical Sensible Learning: I agree with Deane Tank. We learn when we connect the learning to something of value to us. His book examines a learning community created by all stakeholders working together. The focus is always on bringing about meaningful and lasting learning for all students. Nina Koelpin, Ph.D. is a secondary school teacher with over 30 years experience. The debate about how to improve education in the United States has been going on for decades now. Some people advocate for more accountability; others for more funding. Deane Tank argues for more and deeper thinking...
