That the book should be called an unveiling of Jesus Christ agrees best not only with the more closely related language in other books of the N.T. (of course they have also the less specific sense of unveiling mysteries, to which the subjective construction has resort), but with the contents of the book itself. If events are the primary subject the epistles to the seven churches are an excrescence. If the invisible Lord is the primary subject, both parts of the book have a natural and fitting bond. Chapter i. esp. 12--18 is the first revelation of Jesus Christ and the several features of it reappear in the several seven epistles. The next part of the book (cc. iv., v.) opens with the vision of the Throne in heaven and God Most High sitting upon it, then of the Lamb that was slain and the Adoration of Him. Again in c. xix. 11--16 the rider of the white horse is seen going forth to judgement and war, His name being The Word of God. That is, at the outset of the visions which follow the epistles we have a revelation of Jesus Christ in that form which fully expresses the double name, Jesus made both Lord and Christ, the Lamb of suffering and humility adored in heaven in the highest glory; and again another revelation of Jesus Christ in which, though He seem to be quiescent and powerless, He goes forth in...
